Sentence fragments are a common error in student writing. It is indeed fundamental to every formal writing so it is important to completely avoid any sentence fragmentation. Else it only contributes to the reader's confusion and anxiety.

However, you can ignore a few sentence fragmentation rules when it comes to creative writing. There are a variety of circumstances in creative writing where you may even choose to include a sentence fragment write my essay.

Basic concept

Fragments of sentences refer to a phrase or cluster of words that sound like sentences but are basically not complete sentences. Groups of phrases should really have at least one independent clause to constitute a complete sentence. An independent clause is any set of words including both a topic and a verb and must be shown on its own. For instance, 'I want hamburgers' for example is an independent clause.

Fragments in sentences usually never have independent clauses. However, fragments constitute dependent clauses and phrases respectively. Fragments often occur in real sentences as they start with a capital letter and abruptly end with a break.

Here are some highlights for you to avoid your sentence fragmentation;

1. You can't start your sentence with 'which'. Start every sentence with a place, person, or thing. Try to avoid any incomplete sentences. Once written, go through the sentence so that there couldn't be any irregular flow.
1. If you want to start your sentence with 'like', 'such as', or 'essay writer'.

For example;

- Like my brother who works in the aviation department. (FRAGMENT)
  - Like my brother, he loves to play with toy airplanes. (CORRECT)
1. You must avoid starting a sentence using 'ing' words. However, you have to be very careful if you are using such words that end with 'ing'.

For example;

- Rolling down and laughing with excitement turned into amusement. (FRAGMENT)
- Sarah rolled down and laughed with amusement. (CORRECT)

Now you might be thinking about a correct sentence that is starting from an 'ing' word. Exceptions are there, such as:

- Praying always brings relief to the body and soul. (CORRECT)

How can you avoid sentence fragments?

1. They usually appear before and after the independent clauses to which they belong to. For instance;

'When we get to the market. We buy many vegetables.'

Here 'when we got to the market' falls under the category of essay writing service fragmentation. It is a dependent clause. It must be written this way.

'When we reached the market, we bought many vegetables.' or 'we bought many vegetables when we reached the market.'

- A subordinate clause is usually called a dependent clause. It will start with a subordinate conjunction, relative pronouns, or relative adverbs. You will also find a verb and topic. Unfortunately, this combination of words fails to convey a refined thought in itself. If such clauses appear to be at the starting of a sentence, there must be the placement of a comma after that.

To remove this fragment, you will exclude the subordinating word. Resultantly you will be left with the main clause. Let's suppose;

'Because defining a broader perspective is challenging as compared to a narrower one.'

So, you will remove 'because' to make your sentence complete. However, if you want to keep the subordinate clause you can apply it in a way that can fix the fragment by linking it.

1. Look for a subject in your sentence that falls without a verb. Read your sentence aloud so that you could find the error. Or if you have only included a subject without a verb - the sentence is fragmented.

For example;

Dirty shirt, an amusing idea, a pretty girl. (FRAGMENT)

Now,

- The dirty shirt is in the laundry.
  - She has an amusing idea.
  - Sarah is a pretty girl.
1. Finally, read out loud all the sentences so that the errors could be eliminated. Identify sentence fragments that are missing any verb, subject, or an incomplete thought. Rewrite those sentences that are complete in their nature and understandable by the reader.
